of the scene to have its unbiased effect, a discord is constantly obtrided between the positive lines of the story and the neutral tint of the remarks, and the writer, instead of rendering him self invisible, occores invested et rendering him self and so leads his reader to forget him, is the writer who so sensitively strumes atmost to the dominant chord of his story that, though the sense of his words be taken his voice is not heard. Moreover, the writer's lack of sympathy with his characters communicates itself not to the reader atone, but to the characters themselves, and they also begin to pict their way fastidiously through their language and to behave with well-bred self-restraint. Reserve is admirable, but it is nardly creative. There is no the seed planted in the ground.
